The context

Generalised economic crisis

State budget constraints

Cuts in public expenditure

Fast development of the Third Sector:
- Civil Society Organisations (CSOs)
- Social Entrepreneurs (SEs)

- CSOs and SEs need data as a crucial mean to pursue social progress
- Great availability of data and information thanks to IT fast development

The question

CSOs and SEs:

New social needs

New data needs: - Timeliness
- Disaggregation by local level and specific sector
- Innovative indicators

Official Statistics:

Sometimes presents some limits in measuring complex social phenomena using suitable indicators

CSOs and SEs are often forced to produce the needed data by themselves, thus creating a sort of competition with NSIs

but:

- do not have statistical and IT expertise
- encounter barriers to access data
- have shortage of resources (high costs in producing data)

A possible solution

Greater and new forms of collaboration between NSIs and CSOs/SEs which would bring mutual benefits as:

CSOs and SEs would:

- benefit from data quality, IT and statistical skills guaranteed by NSIs
- have a greater availability of data more tailored to their specific needs
- be able to release a greater amount of resources to implement their core activity

NSIs would:

- further investigate on other data sources as support and complement to official statistics
- be stimulated to produce data more timely and at a local level
- improve data visualisation for non-specialised users
- keep their leading role in providing information at the service of society

Conclusions

- The apparent competition between NSIs and Third Sector would turn out to be an opportunity for a fruitful collaboration
- However, a deep analysis of the phenomenon of the Third Sector would be essential even if difficult, given the wide variety of this kind of actors
- More targeted European policies would strengthen the Third Sector's role as a useful partner of NSIs for a smooth integration of their activities at the service of society
